Dear Ms Henney,

This is written to support allowing nutritional information on the benefits of supplements.

They should have a factual base & research references but not have to be so rigidly tested as drugs do.

They should contain what they say they contain & should be subject to prosecution if they don't. If they contain what they claim to contain then the buyer is not deceived & that's Priority # one.

As long as I know what's in the supplement then I can make a decision whether or not to buy it & use it.

So what I'm asking is

- ① Make sure the product is as described
- ② Have some statement of message - but this is not so essential as #1.

Sincerely

R. Chamberlain.
